A stored procedure (also termed proc, storp, sproc, StoPro, StoredProc, StoreProc, sp, or SP) is a subroutine available to applications that access a relational database management system (RDBMS). Such procedures are stored in the database data dictionary.. Uses for stored procedures include data-validation (integrated into the database) or access-control mechanisms.

Stored procedures are (typically small) programs that run in a language that is specific to a particular database server. The programming language varies from database server to database server, and is designed to extend SQL to offer additional functionality thatâ€™s not available through standard SQL syntax.

A Beginner's Guide to Using Stored Procedures with
There has been a lot of debates around when to use stored procedures vs. raw sql. Many purists are vehemently on one side of the fence or the other. Strangely people talk about views to a lesser extent. Stored functions and triggers are almost nonexistent in these debates. In this article we'll try to provide a non-biased outline of the benefits and pitfalls of each approach.

Choice Between Stored Procedures, Functions, Views
For more information about stored routine security, see Section 24.6, â€œAccess Control for Stored Programs and Viewsâ€•. Within a stored routine that is defined with the SQL SECURITY DEFINER characteristic, CURRENT_USER returns the routine's DEFINER value. For information about user auditing within stored routines, see Section 6.3.13, â€œSQL-Based MySQL Account Activity Auditingâ€•.

Introduction . In a relational database application, the main advantage of using stored procedures over single SQL statements is that the query plan (or execution plan) is generated when the stored procedure is created, and the same query plan is reused with every execution of the stored procedure, saving a considerable amount of resources in the database server.

Stored procedures used in callable and prepared statements
