THE ART OF FICTION BY HENRY JAMES SHOULD not have affixed so comprehensive a title to these few remarks, necessarily wanting in any completeness, upon a subject the full consideration of which would carry us far, did I not seem to discover a pretext for my temerity in the interesting pamphlet lately published under this name by Mr. Walter Besant. Mr.

THE ART OF FICTION Art lives upon discussion, upon subject matter in fiction, the morality of fiction, and the character of the novelist. How James deals with these topics should be studied, for in his essays we find the beginnings of modern fictional theory. The basic assumption is that, like any other art form, fiction must be taken seriously by authors, readers, and critics alike.

A lecture on the art of fiction, given by the English critic Walter Besant on April 25, 1884, and an answer to the lecture by American writer Henry James in the same year. For example, Besant insisted that novelists should confine themselves to their own experience, whilst James argued that a sufficiently alert novelist could catch knowledge from everywhere and use it to good purpose.
